they look like. When they know their faces, they cannot kill them by mistake—any wolf who kills a cub must die himself. Then the cubs are free to run where they please until they are old enough to kill for their own food. This meeting was held every month, under the full moon at Council Rock.

On this night, there were about forty wolves of every size and colour at the meeting place. Akela was the leader of the pack. He was a great grey wolf who hunted alone and so was known as The Lone Wolf. When it was time, Father Wolf pushed Mowgli into the centre of the circle. The baby sat there, laughing and playing with some small stones.

Then, out of the dark, they all heard the voice of Shere Khan.

“This baby is not a wolf! He’s mine! Give him to me!”

There was much growling and snarling, but they listened to Akela. His eyes moved around the circle of wolves.

“Look well, O wolves! Look well! Remember the face of this cub and keep him safe! Remember, too, that we do not take orders from anyone outside the pack!”

Just then, a four-year-old spoke up.

“Indeed, what do we need a human baby for?”

“The Law of the Jungle says that if there is an argument about a cub joining the pack, two others of the pack who are not his father or mother must speak for him. Who speaks for this baby?”

There was only one other animal the wolves let speak at the Council meetings and that was Baloo, the sleepy brown bear who taught new cubs the ways of the jungle. He slowly stepped forward into the circle.

“I speak for the Man’s baby. Let him run with the pack! I myself will teach him.”
