Zapman's Super Mistake

By Kate Poels

Illustrated by Mario Gushiken

There are two things people always say about superheroes.

Number one: they are SUPER.

Number two: they are HEROES.

Superheroes are very keen to show us how they can zoom through space faster than a rocket. Or how they can catch a hundred bad guys with just a piece of string.

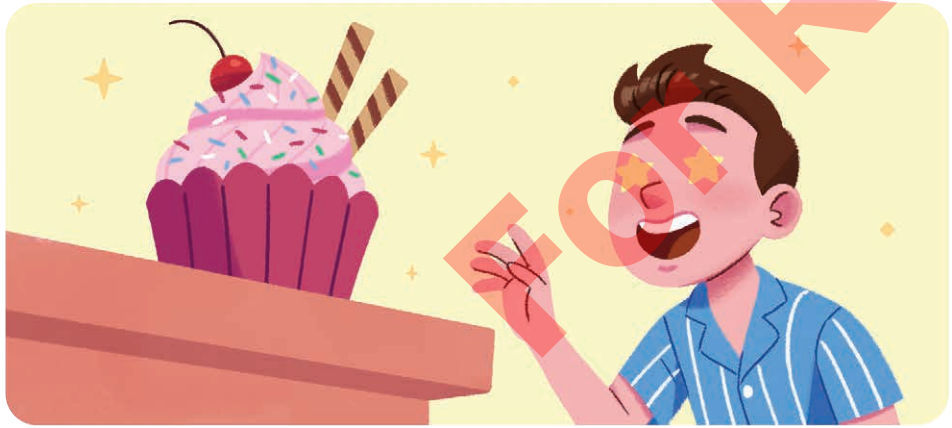

But never forget that, under their fancy suits, they are just like you and me.

They like to watch cartoons in their PJs. They like to eat chocolate cereal straight from the packet.

And if you offer them a plate of cakes, they'll always choose the biggest one with the most sprinkles.

They also pick their noses when they think nobody is watching.

They have good days. Lots of them. We know all about those. But they have bad days too. They just don't like to talk about them.

Zapman had one of these bad days not so long ago. It all began when he got up too late. Zapman hadn't ironed his suit, so he had to eat breakfast in just his pants and mask.

Zapman loved milkshakes. His very favourite kind was thick, pink milk. It tasted of strawberries and cream, and it always made him smile. That day he had FOUR big glasses with his toast and jam.
